Folks,

If Microsoft is going to be punished it should be through them providing x amount of dollars with which the education sector can use as it pleases. Allow MS to provide products will be letting them off easy. The real cost of software is quite low and I'm sure that if the settlement is $10 M they will use the S.R.P. their products to calculate how much they need to provide.

Another thought is that it would be nice for the settlement to result in something that doesn't support the high tech industry. Like paying the salaries of librarians in the inner city, or buying new books, a coat of paint or a new building for a school.
